The New Court Dress.
The Lord Chamberlain's notice, announcing a change in the fashion of Court dress, is of i	n torest to others besides constiers and tailor It marks the termination of a social epoch. The	h original idea of the curious arrangement and which unbeneficed civilians—to misuse an eclesiastical term—and unbeneficed civilians out	10
. are required to approach the Sovereign in possible dress seems to have been something	Ą this kind. Only gentlemen can have any right of presentation to the King; the first mark	of n gentleman is his costume, and more especial lies sword; consequently, any gentleman a	p. plying for admission to Court will wear the dress word only by gentlemen, and the swor. He was not originally forced to do it by an	4 published urder such as now exists but he we expected to do it, just us he is now expected to	na bo wear a dress cont at a dinner party, and he a more thought of disappointing the expectation	11) than he now does of dining out in a pen-jacke. When the great democratic change came is abolishing dress as a distinction of grade-	a, perhaps the greatest external change ever effected in English society—the Court not me	g g <ul> <li>miturally adhered to the old ideas, and the onl dress known as distinctively that of a gentlema</li> </ul>	ly m was still insisted on, till the Court dress of civilians without appointments became stere otyped, although that of soldiers, anyal afficer	0.
and, we believe, diplomatists changed near	y sidered gentlemen by virtue of their commissions, and consequently no special dress we	8+ 13 required by the Court in proof of their gentilit or is now required. They appear to this day i	u what, properly speaking, is their ordinary dress their uniform.—the practice of appearing is public in must being merely a practice, fosters	in dislike to make the Army conspicuous—an	'n.
and officer of to day clad in the uniform of George III.'s time would appear quite as ride onlous to himself and other people as the civilia	i-does in his gorgeous array. As the Cour learns the anhatance of power, has adhere	ŧ.
more rigidly to ctiquette, and its receptions becoming crowded, have been reduced to income	A.
wenight forms, the original idea has passe away, and Court dress, originally worn as customary mark of caste, has come to be re-	a . garded as part of the special ceremonial of the Court, a ceremonial which is exceedingly had	A. densome in other detail than dress, and which in out perhaps so important as even statesment	H have been accustomed to maintain. The old coremoniousness of intercourse has been about the listed everywhere else in England without to any perceptible degree impairing the respect	t.
Court ctiquette is not binding on those who, it there were any reality in ceremonial, wonl	d most need its withes namely, the public writers, who nevertheless are a hundred times more courteous to the Throne than they were in day	i-when a rough satire was followed by imprisonment. Having become part of a special cere	ı.
by the Sovereign at pleasure, or abolisher	đ altogether, and the new one, the first on originated by the Court, is a very curious com- promise between two ideas,—the notion that	i.
special dress is essential to the stateliness if no to the splendour of a Court, and the feeling	t that such dress ought to correspond, in some degree at all events, to the dress adopted by the	8
muss of Her Majesty's subjects, in fact, between the monarchical and the democratic theory of society.	ſ
The first idea, though, as we think, unreal can be plausibly defended. If the monarchy is really—as, for example, Mr. Bagehot in his work on the Constitution contends with such really—as, for example, Mr. Bagehot in his work on the Constitution contends with such pleasant ability—a coremonial institution, excoordingly valuable because from a certain bright- ness it is visible to shortsighted men, or because	. 1 it brings home to the masses an idea that they are governed, which healthy idea would other-which belos to scoure that end is in itself good, and it is not easy to prove that the practice of	1 wearing a uniform when approaching the So- versign does not so help. The custom may be	1 that it is not effications. Many very tiresome and vexations customs, as, for example, that of	1 n private saluting an officer, or of a member of the House of Commons bowing as he crosses in	1 front of a Speaker, are supposed, apparently with reason, to maintain in the minds of those	1 who obey them a judicious habit of reverence and order, and the wearing of a special disquise in the Sovereign's presence may do so likewise.	1
It certainly tends to preserve the unusualness of the scene, and in some degree also its aplendour. Male dress in England just now is in principle affectedly simple, in form abominably ngly, and in colony more sombre than mything- n Nature.—Nature, to her benour be it socken, lighting black, or using it only when she in-	C ends to suspend the utility of the eyes.—and orilliant uniform certainly adde to the brilliancy.	4.50 of the scena in which it is displayed. No painter who could help it would place full-dressed Engishmen in the foreground of a scene intended o be bright, or judged of any concavable scene n which he could consistently omit them. The	1 old Court dress, though bad in form—for dress, o be stately, must approach dranery, and the	B Jourt dress, next to a barlequin's, was the one east like drapery—and though; from an udd; hange of fachion invested with slightly indicross saxuations, was at once very peculiar, very triking, and exceedingly brilliant in massed	ŕ frech. If, therefore, Mr. Bagehot's theory is orrect, it would be difficult to prove it a bad	K ress. more especially as it had begun to gather o itself comething of the respect paid every- there to antique forms. But then this defence rets on Mr. Bagehot's theory, and is only com-t course deny Mr. Bagehot's postulate, affirm-	i e nois, injurious, as tending only to consecrate in in-	P reased by every approach which the Sovereign akes towards his true position—that of the	15 synament moderator of the condicts necessarily ising among a free people. A distinct appoint would be made towards that idea by the	_ coltion of Court costume, and it is howards	1

should be made towards that deaply the should be made towards this that the few order tends, though the Court, in making the change, was obviously still in.

The situate on the Ground-floor in Bank alternative dress, for Levees, in particular, is Buildings, immediately opposite the New ordinary modern full dress, spoilt as to form by a ridiculous gold-embroidered straight collar and gilt stripe, but improved by the substitu-tion of velvet for broadcloth. We say spoilt in an artistic sense, for nunatural as the dresscoal necessarily is though, to be sure Heaven made the London sparrow, and the London sparrow wears it it is infinitely worse with a straight collar, and worst of all with a atraight collar of a different colour and effect; and we say improved in an artistic sense, for velvet admits of theiplay of light on the dress, and a broadcloth does not. It is the difference herween a scimetar and a sickle, the one steel instrument which flashes back no ray. We are told indeed that velvet trousers will look bad, or even vulgar; but remembering certain artist dresses in Paris, we feel inclined to doubt that dictum, and helleve that the new dress, if the straight collar were abolished, and gold em. broidery replaced by white lace on the wrists. would be a picturesque and stately costume: but still it is an official dress or Court uniform, not capable of being worn elsewhere than in the Sovereign's presence, and therefore a bad dress, bad not only because any dress seldom worn must be worn awkwardly, but because, as we think, it interferes with the true idea of modern English etiquette, which is to retain so much of formulity as facilitates intercourse in a complex society, and no more. ----The Bank of England prints 28,000 bank THE COMING MAN AND THE VELOCIPEDE,-The Rev.
